

Reaping the whirlwind of WWII

Two weeks ago, seemingly within a three- to four-day span, the mainstream media—doing the bidding of its masters—began the propagandizing of United States citizens, first mentioning that it was suspected that Hezbollah's missiles were Iranian made.

No more than 72 to 96 hours after the initial allegations that Hezbollah's missiles were trucked in from Iran, the ultimate revelation was reached: the whole of Lebanon was acting as a proxy for Iran.

Tom Brokaw, in his latest appearance on the Today Show, added his weight to the selling of Iran as the new bogeyman, saying we all had to look past the problems between Israel and Lebanon and focus on Iran because Iran "hates Israel."

Brokaw, a Council on Foreign Relations member, has endeared himself to many with his book, The Greatest Generation, and rightly so, but Brokaw has been one of the biggest spinmeisters in the history of broadcast journalism.

Because of his great credibility, he was traipsed out onto the Today set to sell the eventual incursion into Iran.

But the U.S. should beware of invading yet another country, especially if that country is Iran.

Perhaps we should heed the veiled message in the book, The Grand Chessboard, written nearly 10 years ago by Zbigniew Brzezinski, another CFR member.

Brzezinski wrote that the U.S. would not be wise to agitate Iran for the polarization it will create between the U.S. and a Russia-China axis that will back Iran.

Even as this column is being written, the buzz is going around the lapdog media that China is spying on the Israeli weapon industry, backward engineering the technology, and providing the resultant hardware to Iran.

Now the U.S. warmongers have justification for being at odds with China. And that creates linkage to the second of the three nations prophesied to turn on the U.S. military.

In time, Russia will join the axis that Brzezinski wrote about, and there is no way U. S. military might can prevail against it.

Right now—whether we can see it or not—the flames are being fanned for another world war.

With all the arms peddling, the beefing up of the major principals' arsenals, the teetering global economy, and a summer Olympics being hosted by a nation on the cusp of aggression, we are witnessing the unfolding of the same script that led to World War II.

Just as Hitler showcased Germany during the 1936 Summer Olympics, so will China put on its airs in 2008 Summer Olympics.

And as the Olympics become a fading memory, China will make her move on Taiwan, just as Germany created an incident as a pretense to invade Poland—the triggering event that set her off on continental-wide aggression and eventually embroiled the world in war.

No matter what our corrupt government tells us about bringing the troops home, our building of massive bases in Iraq and Israel bespeaks quite a different future for our military.

Our military is in the Middle East to stay. And don't be surprised if a draft is enacted.

Though the media gives air to Donnie Rumsfeld and the other useful Pentagon tools who swear it won't happen, the fact of the matter is that there is still legislation on The Hill updated as recently as 2005 that calls for compulsory military or national (Brownshirts) service for all

U.S. citizens age 18 to 25 for 15 months, a term scaled back from the originally proposed two years.

The name of the original piece of legislation was the Universal Military Service Act, but the government gangsters have re-titled the bill the Universal National Service Act.

They had to get that nasty word Military out of there to better sneak it by the masses.

Consider another propaganda scheme: The statement that we're freer here because our troops are fighting over there.

President Bush can parrot that Orwellian non sequitur all he wants, but it still doesn't make any sense or have any basis in reality. It's a propaganda slogan. And the tragedy is that it's working.

The events of 9-11 happened inside our borders, not 2000 miles away. The supposed perpetrators gained entrance and remained inside our borders. They didn't strike from 2000 miles away. The problem was inside our borders, not 2000 miles away.

If the Middle East is a breeding ground for terrorism, the terrorists still have to make it over here to do us harm.

Yet our country is wide open with our borders like sieves.

Bringing the fight to the terrorists' backyard is a winless proposition. And, by now, there is no shortage or end to the people who will rise up and bear arms against our military, which they see as the invaders.

And are we any freer here, really?

Every time the government scares us about "chatter" that something might happen, we the people are more than willing to give up more freedoms and privacy.

Well, soon, there will be nothing left to give up and no lifestyle worth preserving.

And invading Iran will undoubtedly happen.

It's part of the plan to bring chaos to this planet so that the masses will beg for world government, believing the false promise that global rule is the only way to bring about peace.

That's a lie as old as the Tower of Babel.

For those who believe on scripture, that should be a hint as to the true force behind this coming apocalypse.
