

Building a North American Community

What's so laughable about our governmental system is that, whether we know it or not, we have none.

Oh, sure, we watch the alphabet networks and think we're really, really informed about the latest political doings.

And we think that nothing can get by us because we monitor these garbage networks that allegedly have their pulse on the real heartbeat of the District of Criminals and the rest of the world.

But guess what? We don't know jack. And we had better wake up.

The reason we have no clue is because the whole mainstream news—to include our beloved PBS and NPR—can only transmit what it's told to.

Let's take this issue on for size:

Have you ever heard or read about this white paper entitled “Building a North American Community”?

Of course you haven't.

Why?

Because the mainstream whores won't or can't tell you about it.

But this is where we're headed—to a North American Union—though our useless representatives make believe they're defending the sovereignty of the United States.

Here are the organizations that drafted this paper: the Council on Foreign Relations, the Canadian Council of Chief Executives, and the Consejo Mexicano de Asuntos Internacionales.

How familiar are you with any of these organizations?

None, right?

Well, read the paper here:

<http://www.usembassycanada.gov/content/canusa/northamericancommunityTFfinal.pdf>.

Here's the shadow governments' opening statement, which is a web of lies:

“The council takes no institutional position on policy issues and has no affiliation with the U.S. government. All statements of fact and expressions of opinion contained in its publications are the sole responsibility of the author or authors.”

That sounds great, but it doesn't wash with what follows:

“The recommendations of the Task Force fall into two broad categories that correspond with the imperative to build a safer and more prosperous continent. The Task Force also proposes reforms and institutions within each of the three governments to promote progress in these areas. The Task Force has framed its recommendations into shorter-term measures that should be pursued now, and long-term steps to be implemented by 2010.”

If the Council on Foreign Relations has “no affiliation with the U.S. government,” then who is supposed to implement the measures the CFR is recommending?

Why the very government the CFR claims to have no affiliation to.

Okay. Enough of this doublespeak.

Here we have non-governmental, unelected bodies making policy not only for this nation but the hemisphere, though these same bodies deny having any connection to governments.

When will we in the U.S. understand that our representatives don't represent anything but global interests?

Later in the paper it states:

“The global challenges faced by North America cannot be met solely through unilateral or bilateral efforts or existing patterns of cooperation. They require deepened cooperation based on the principle, affirmed in the March 2005 Joint Statement by Canada, Mexico, and the United States, that ‘our security and prosperity are mutually dependent and complementary.’

“Establishment by 2010 of a security and economic community for North America is an ambitious but achievable goal that is consistent with this principle and, more important, buttresses the goals and values of the citizens of North America, who share a desire for safe and secure societies, economic opportunity and prosperity, and strong democratic institutions.”

You know what?

I don’t want to be a “citizen of North America.”

I want to be a citizen of the United States.

I like our laws. I like our Constitution, though it doesn’t matter for much anymore. I like our language, which, by the way, is still English.

I don’t want to be a countryman to either the Canadians or Mexicans. If I did, I would’ve moved to Canada or Mexico.

I am happy to live in the U.S., and I don’t want to see this republic disappear bit by bit into the North American Union.

Politicians are not going to stop this. Only we the people can.

But, first, we have to realize that, though Democrats and Republicans may argue and fight in front of the cameras, it’s just a distraction to keep us from focusing on what and who really runs this country.

Every November Democrats swear that, if they get into office, things will get better. And every November Republicans swear that, if they get into office, things will get better.

Have we ever really seen things get better?

For all of our tax breaks, we still pay more and more to the Federal Reserve. Every year we watch our savings, mutual funds, retirement accounts, and pensions get looted. Every day we get raped by corporations.

But why worry; after all, the Democrats and Republicans are behind us. They’ll make things better.

And, now, while we drool in front of our televisions, the economic, legislative, judicial and geographical borders between nations in North America are subtly being erased.

Kids in school are no longer taught about U.S. history or geography. They’re too busy being prepared to be “global citizens.”

I complain a lot about the U.S. But I never take it for granted.

I do, however, understand this: that when the U.S. is gone, it’s gone for good. And this garbage about globalization is yet another lie to seduce us to relinquish our heritage and our children’s future.

And, sadly, one day the children of those children will ask—as was prophesied nearly 80 years ago by the globalist wretch H.G. Wells in The Open Conspiracy—“Was there ever such a world?”
