

It's not Kansas anymore . . . and never was

Once again I'll interrupt a series to address certain issues.

For those of you who get upset with this column, please understand a few things:

What I write is seldom my opinion, but the relaying of information gleaned from reliable and multiple sources. That means you won't find them on your alphabet propaganda networks or in your corporate-money-soaked daily newspapers.

I also love the land of my birth, but I realize we've been fed lies for over a century about our history, our government, our education system, and where this nation is headed in the coming years.

And the destination to which we are headed is one of destruction and one from which we will never return.

You won't suffer for it, but your children and grandchildren will.

I am not a Communist, Marxist, or socialist. I'm not a Republican or a Democrat.

I am, however, endeavoring to warn you through this newspaper column, as I have warned countless others around the world through my website and radio show, that we freedom-loving people have been and continue to be lied to.

And once people take the time to examine—rather than ignorantly dismiss—what I have shared with them, it's not a great leap to understand the fix has always been in on us: the little people.

Since the early part of the twentieth century, we've not had a free press; neither have we had accurate history texts books that relate the real story about the United States from its founding unto this present day. This was an issue covered in the Norman Dodd columns two weeks ago.

You think you are informed because you watch CNN and Fox and suck down the slop the psychological-operation experts dish out, especially on the aforementioned networks.

A conspiracy theory? Hardly.

To be sure, the takeover of America is indeed a conspiracy. But it's far from a theory.

It's been going on in earnest for a century, and the same dark personages who are carrying it out are the same ones who bought out the information outlets to make sure no revealing light was ever cast upon them and their deeds.

Most of you have sensed something's never been quite right about the way events have been portrayed.

And it's understandable that most of you have chosen to believe the myths for the comfort you derive from blissfully sticking your head in the sand.

Well, there's one guarantee about doing that: you're going to get your butt fully kicked.

And for those of you who can manage no more intelligent a remark than, "Well, even if that's true, there's nothing we can do about it anyway."

Well, you know what? That's as gross a statement as "if rape is inevitable, you might as well enjoy it."

Yes, that's a brutal statement, but it's not lost on those of you who don't care that their nation is going down the tubes because, after all, you might actually have to inconvenience yourselves, break a sweat or a nail, trying to make a difference.

Now, if you want to know who those dark personages are, then you need not look further than the Robber Barons of the early twentieth century and the preeminent bankers of that time because they are the preeminent bankers of this time.

They—through their generations—still hold sway through their corporations, tax-exempt foundations, and think tanks—of which there seems to be no end.

Yes, we're talking about the Rockefellers and Carnegies, the Council on Foreign Relations, the Rand Corporation, the Brookings and Stanford Research institutes, the vermin who came out of the University of Chicago like John Dewey, the father of modern education and a flaming Marxist.

How in the world did the good people of this land allow the handing over of our education system to creeps like Dewey and Benjamin Bloom, whose revered taxonomy has as its goal: the "behavioral objective"

Aren't we talking about learning? Then what's with the behavioral objective?

Might our education system be treating our children as Pavlovian widgets?

Ah, yeah.

It's training, folks. It's not learning.

But I'll pick that matter up when the curriculum series continues.

Let's get back to the national scene.

Presidents are the chief whores. They've not done a thing on their own since before Teddy Roosevelt took office.

Well, when one did try—his name was John Kennedy—he was executed, supposedly, by a lone gunman.

Right.

Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield and William McKinley were popped within a 36-year span.

All by lone gunmen?

Get a grip.

Heads of state are not repeatedly killed by nuts.

Heads of state are killed when they choose not to cave to global designs on our nation.

Presidents get killed when they don't play ball with the money masters, who not only reside here but around the world.

And it's always been about the money, really.

What do you think wars are about?

Right and wrong?

Hardly.

It's about profits.

And think about this, especially you Bible-believing Christians:

Jesus Christ walked on water, calmed the wind, healed the sick, raised the dead, rebuked the Sadducees and Pharisees, and never was in peril.

But three days after He chased the moneychangers, a.k.a. bankers, out of the temple, He was brought before Pilate.

Yes, this was prophesied, so it had to happen.

But just remember who brought Him to that moment.

And nothing's changed.

Presidents are corrupt or they wouldn't get to the White House. Governments—constructs of human beings not Divine Law—are corrupt. The love of money is still the root of all evil. It's also the reason thousands of our men and women are sent off to die with each generation through a misuse and abuse of our military.

And it will continue until good people finally have had enough and make the bleeding stop.
